Market Review

The Philippine Stock Equity index (PSEi) was flat in the month of March, closing at 6,499 level. Note that from the recent peak in January, the market is already down by around 7% due to concerns over the macroeconomic environment such as persistently high inflation in January and February. As a result, there were concerns that the Bangko Sentral ng Pilipinas could further hike interest rates that would slow down the economy.

The improvement in the macroeconomic environment appears to be delayed given that January and February inflation remains persistently high at 8.7% and 8.6% from prior years respectively. In response, the BSP has hiked policy rates by a cumulative 75bps in February and March. On the positive side, we are seeing improvement in the inflation picture given that March inflation decelerated to 7.6%, opening up the possibility for a pause in hiking interest rates.

Corporates have started to report earnings of fourth quarter 2022 in February and March. The banking sector reported strong fourth quarter earnings driven by loan growth, net interest margin expansion and lower non performing loans. The property sector on the other hand reported strong earnings driven by the recovery in the shopping mall segment. Meanwhile the telecommunication sector reported weaker than expected results given the deceleration in broadband subscriber growth coupled with high operating costs. Overall, majority of corporates reported strong earnings and well above and within consensus expectations.

Outlook

We have a positive view in Philippine Equities given that the weakness of the market has likely priced in the macroeconomic headwinds such as high inflation and rising interest rates. Currently, PSEi is only trading at around 12x forward PER, a discount from historical average of around 15-16x. Meanwhile consumer demand appears to remain resilient as early indicated by fourth quarter 2022 earnings results from the banks, consumer and property sectors. Generally the corporate earnings for 4Q22 earnings reported in March have been upbeat, providing confidence that consumer spending will remain strong in the near future despite the high inflation.
