Market Review

Broad-based global indexes rose in July, building on their rally of the prior three months. Uncertainty related to tariffs and the geopolitical environment continued to recede, providing support for investor sentiment. Notably, the gains occurred with shifting leadership under the surface. In a departure from recent trends, the US led the markets higher amid robust participation from retail investors and a resurgence of enthusiasm about artificial intelligence (AI). In addition, markets appeared encouraged by the backdrop of healthy economic growth and better-than-expected earnings from mega-cap US technology companies. As a result, major large-cap indexes in the US hit a series of all-time highs throughout the course of the month. Emerging markets also performed well and outpaced their developed peers behind strength in China and technology-driven Taiwan and South Korea. On the other hand, the rally in European stocks paused, following the region's impressive run-up in the first half of the year. Returns in developed Asia were also soft due to a small loss for Japan.

Outlook

Macro developments continue to dominate headlines, elevating uncertainty and volatility. In the short term, resilient economic data and good earnings growth have resulted in high stock valuations. With tariffs and global supply chain disruptions, we expect global growth to slow down. Balancing those time horizons, the portfolio managers remain anchored in the belief that high-quality industry leaders will deliver consistently solid financial results over time.
