Market Review

The US bond market posted mixed results in May, but overall yields declined as bond prices rose broadly. One factor driving yields up was the ongoing uncertainty surrounding US tariffs and their potential escalation. Additionally, a tax and spending bill approved by the House of Representatives raised concerns about the US fiscal deficit. On the positive side, economic data released during the month showed a stable unemployment rate, better-than-expected consumer spending, and the lowest year-over-year inflation reading in over four years. Despite the tame inflation data, expectations for more short-term interest rate cuts by the US Federal Reserve (Fed) in 2025 eased in May.

For the month, US bond yields rose across the board, with little difference in magnitude. However, sector performance varied considerably—US Treasury securities and residential mortgage-backed securities declined notably, investment-grade corporate bonds were essentially unchanged, and high-yield corporate bonds and asset-backed securities posted positive returns for the month.

Outlook

With the market focus shifting from the US Fed and inflation to tariffs and implications for growth, interest rates rallied. We anticipate that the US Fed will continue to depend on data and will not react impulsively to the Trump administration's policy announcements. While broader economic data have softened somewhat, labor markets remain stable, and inflation appears to be broadly contained, although still above the US Fed's target.

We favor defensive sectors, such as electric utilities, which have demonstrated resilience during stressful periods and provided solid downside protection. This sector is primarily insulated from the current tariff war. The majority of the preferred universe consists of financials, which are expected to experience little to no direct impact from tariffs, particularly in the insurance sector. In conclusion, there are still attractive opportunities to generate income within the credit and spread sectors, with the potential for spread compression and limited risk of permanent capital impairment.

The Fund mentioned in this document is specific to variable life insurance contracts and is not considered a mutual fund. Yields depend on interest and foreign exchange rate levels, both of which may fluctuate. Other factors that affect yield include changes in the credit standing of the issuers and changes in the value of the stocks and dividends received. Further, investments of the Fund may provide that their values be determined based on prices or yields of other securities, instruments or foreign currencies, and such provisions may result in negative fluctuations in the value of these investments and, in turn, the Fund's yields. Thus, the performance of the separate account(s) is not guaranteed and the value of the policy could be less than the capital invested. THE VARIABLE LIFE POLICYHOLDER SHALL BEAR ALL INVESTMENT RISKS. Past performance of the Fund is not necessarily indicative of future performance. Yields are not guaranteed.
