Market Review

The Philippine market rally continued in October with the PSEi rising 1.5% in the period, closing at 7,055. The market's 13% rally in the last three months brought YTD performance to a positive 0.4%. Continued improvement in vaccination rates and a decline in COVID-19 infections were the main drivers of the most recent move. The financial sector also showed encouraging signs of loan growth, indicating a recovery in economic activity.

Mobility restrictions were eased in Metro Manila last October as the government reduced the Alert Level from 4 to 3. This increases the allowed capacity and operations of establishments such as restaurants and personal care. Social gatherings were also allowed under Alert Level 3, further reopening the economy. In addition, we see sustained improvement in vaccination rate with Metro Manila already at 60% of population. Availability of vaccines also has become less of a concern, prompting the government to open the vaccination to the general population.

Surprising on the upside, the Philippine economy grew by 7.1% in the third quarter, notwithstanding the lockdowns in place for most of the period. The upbeat performance bolstered investors as it showed that economic growth is attainable despite mobility restrictions. In addition, October inflation slowed to 4.6% from September's 4.8% on improved food costs assisted by policy interventions such as an increase in pork imports and reduction in tariffs.

Outlook

Key macroeconomic data also support the view that the country continues to recovery from the pandemic. September industry commercial loan portfolio was up 2.7% YoY, sustaining the improvement seen the prior month. Meanwhile latest data on external trade showed imports and exports growing by 31% and 18% YoY, respectively. OFW remittances were also up by 5% YoY as of August.

The reopening of the economy continues into early November as the government further eased mobility restrictions in the capital. Meanwhile activities related to the upcoming national elections in May 2022 has started to gather steam, potentially boosting spending and corporate earnings. These factors support a positive view on cyclical sectors such as Real Estate, Financials and Consumer.

However, the rise in local bond yields continued as the existing supply risk overshadowed the positive economic data. The Bureau of Treasury (BTr) recently announced a new Retail Treasury Bond (RTB) issuance which was unexpected at this late in the year. Local bond yields trended higher by 20-50bps following the announcement as investors lightened their holdings ahead of the pricing of the new RTB. As we wait for more details on the upcoming RTB, we shifted to a slightly shorter duration vis-a-vis the benchmark to defensively position the portfolios to withstand the higher inflation environment.
